Reflections on a Lifetime

Another interesting aspect of my mother's death should be recorded. My grandfather, Monroe H. Rentz, now a widower whose wife had died just three months earlier at the age of fifty-two, was travelling south toward Florida and no one knew where to reach him to inform him of my mother's death. Someone suggested the use of radio and the authorities requested a radio station to broadcast a message to him. A telegram was later received from him stating that he received the message in Atlanta and that he would start north at once. The date of the funeral was then established.

The death of my mother altered the course of my life completely and I have often felt that had she been able to lead a long and normal life, my future would have been entirely different. I may have avoided some very unpleasant hardships but I may never have gone to college, since few did in those days. As it was, I was the first in our immediate family to graduate from a four-year college.

Immediately after mother's death, Dad put the farm up for sale and three weeks later there was a public sale on February 23, 1928. As I write these lines and re-read the sale bill, it is easy enough to get nostalgic. In fact, a lump exists in my throat as I type. We loved that little fifty-one acre farm, thirty-two acres of it was described as "the very best farmland and in a good state of cultivation, the balance is timber and pasture land with a fine meadow with a stream of never failing water." There was no way my father could have kept the farm as he was $12,000 in debt and he could not have succeeded without my mother's help. And so, all our favorite animals were sold, two beautiful mare horses, seven head of Holstein and Guernsey cattle, our favorite sheep with some of the ewes bearing lambs on the day of the sale, farm equipment including a new Fordson tractor, household goods including a Columbia range with water tank and good as new. You see, my parents lived here less than three years and bought almost everything new when they moved back to the farming community. I am convinced that they intended to stay there the rest of their lives.

Now, what do we do? My grandfather in recent years built two new three-story brick homes for $5,000 each on the outskirts of York in a small village known as Shiloh. My grandparents moved there prior to my grandmother's death, they lived in one and my Aunt Ethel and her husband, Heber Coulson, lived in the adjacent one. After grandmother's death, grandfather moved next door with his daughter and our family moved into his place. This house became the one I called home, for it was here I lived until I went away to graduate school eleven years later.

After a normal period of adjustment even for a nine year old, life in Shiloh took on an entirely new meaning. Grandfather was then Superintendent of the Wrightsville-Columbia bridge, a new inter-county bridge over the Susquehanna River a few miles east of York. He served in this capacity for twelve years until it became toll free. I remember so well visiting his little office on a hill overlooking the beautiful bridge and river where he counted the receipts from the tolls daily. I thought he was the most important man alive in those days and I did respect him so much.

My Daze

PEOPLE... Mrs. Mike Nell claims she read our column every week, but was insulted last week when we printed a column "for men only". After all, Mrs. Nell, you must remember that a man's car is almost as important to him as his wife!...Cousa him more to run, too!...Read in the paper where Henry Roth (reporter at large early running WGET) announced he was elected one of the Honorary Fire Chiefs of Adams Co. Now don't get "burnt up," but I "ash" you Henry. When do you find time to go put out fires? Nother thing. Please take lessons in Photography, old boy. Maybe you oughta go see that Lane guy and brush up on your exposures! Johnny Baker pleased as punch to note his pic in the paper. His wife not so pleased. Said he didn't look "so hot" in that cap he was wearing. I got news for you. The pic was OK. Photog Henry Roth made him look bad. Have been staying away from the Dillsburg Bank these past few daze...Chester Stauffer claims I made his staff work three hours overtime (he said "six," but I cut it in half) finding a mistake in one of my deposit slips. Have been getting dirty looks from him. Wayne, and the gals! I'll probably get a threatening letter from John Wagner in the near future.

FARMER'S DAY...Just in case you people in Adams Co. aren't familiar with our annual Farmer's Day, let me acquaint you. It's held here in Dillsburg once every year in October. Climaxed by a wonderful and fun making parade, you'll just have the time of your life joining in the festivities. Plan to attend and bring the kids. If you like to parade yourself, we invite you to enter, and compete for prizes. Kids parade will be held Friday Evening, and the big parade on Saturday.

PET CRIPES...The cleaner who brings back my wife's garments minus buttons, those crazy glasses they give you to watch the 3-D movies, drinking fountains that splatter the water everywhere but in your mouth, the pesky flies that linger long after summer is gone, socks with a hole in the toe, The Times acquisition of a postage machine, making it necessary for me to furnish my own stamps. Weekly HEALTH TIP

ELDERLY FALLS

Falls are the common cause of death among the elderly - generally from complications of hip fractures. It is wise to install hand railings from bedrooms, thru hallways, to the bathroom and kitchen for support, and to help maintain balance. A hand railing from the entry door throughout the house is also recommended. Before arising, a few deep breaths to increase oxygen in the bloodstream may avoid weakness or fainting.

1990 Farmers' Fair Queen Contestants

This year's Farmers Fair Queen Contest will be held on Thursday, October 18 at the Northern Middle School. This event marks the opening of Farmers Fair, now in its 75th Year, and is sponsored by the Dillsburg Women's Club. Judges from outside the area will be asked to choose this year's queen and two runner ups.

The queen and her court will parade down the main street during both the children's parade on Friday night and the Fantastic Parade on Saturday night, October 19 and 20.

Over thirty thousand people are expected to attend this three day event. This year the Fair Association will be selling 75th Anniversary mugs, calendars and pins.
